SHORT SYNOPSIS

The Young Victoria chronicles Queen Victoria's ascension to the throne, focusing on the early turbulent years of her reign and her legendary romance and marriage to Prince Albert.

SYNOPSIS

1837. VICTORIA (17) (Emily Blunt) is the object of a royal power struggle. Her uncle, KING WILLIAM (Jim Broadbent), is dying and Victoria is in line for the throne. Everyone is vying to win her favor. However Victoria is kept from the court by her overbearing mother, THE DUCHESS OF KENT (Miranda Richardson), and her ambitious advisor, CONROY (Mark Strong). Victoria hates them both. Her only friend is her dotting governess, LEHZEN (Jeanette Hain), who is seemingly as untrustworthy as the rest.

Victoria's handsome cousin, ALBERT (Rupert Friend) is invited to visit by her mother. He's also the nephew of her Uncle, KING LEOPOLD OF BELGIUM (Thomas Kretschmann). It's obvious that Albert has been coached to win her hand. At first she's annoyed as she has no intention of being married. She never wants to be controlled again. However Albert is also tired of being manipulated by his relatives. Victoria and Albert talk openly and sincerely and become friends. When he returns home she grants him permission to write to her. King Leopold is delighted and pushes Albert to woo her. Albert refuses because he knows she's not ready and he won't return to London until she invites him. Leopold reluctantly waits.

Meanwhile King William dies and Victoria is crowned the Queen of England. Albert visits London to witness the coronation and the friendship between Victoria and Albert deepens. Victoria's first decree is to banish her mother and Conroy to a remote palace apartment. She embraces LORD MELBOURNE (Paul Bettany), the charming Prime Minister, as her sole advisor. They become inseparable and although his motives are slightly self serving, he truly cares for her and wants her to succeed.

The public loves their new Queen. She's cheered as she rides through the streets but this honeymoon with the public comes to a sudden end. Melbourne's party is defeated in the elections and his rival, PEEL (Michael Maloney), demands that Victoria replace her ladies in waiting with the wives of his allies. Victoria refuses. The backlash is furious. The newspapers declare that Victoria is opposing the public's will. They are outraged.

King Leopold is convinced that now, while Victoria is humbled, is the time for Albert to strike. Albert reluctantly arrives at the Palace for a visit. They spend happy hours together and Victoria is struck by how handsome and sincere he is but she is not ready for marriage. It only takes a few months after his departure for Victoria to realize Albert is the man she wants to marry and following Royal protocol, invites him to marry her.

The spectacle of the royal wedding wins over the public. The handsome young Prince and Queen are cheered and all seems well in the Royal household.

However tensions between Albert and Victoria start to emerge. She wants an obedient friend and lover, not a controlling husband. He, however, wants to be her partner and equal and makes political suggestions. Victoria is furious. She is the Queen and she will decide her business! Albert is hurt and has little to do in his new role as Consort. Eventually, with QUEEN ADELAIDE'S (Harriet Walter) encouragement, she allows him to re-organize the palace staff. He does a great job - the household is more efficient than it's been in centuries.

Victoria becomes pregnant. Life should be perfect. But they argue when she sees Albert talking with politicians at a party. She's incensed that he is taking the lead without her permission. They are later riding through the streets when a crazed man tries to shoot Victoria. Albert throws her to the carriage floor and is shot trying to protect her.

Victoria realizes what a selfish woman she's become. She begs Albert's forgiveness as he insists that all he's ever wanted was what was best for her. Trusting him completely, she's now ready to accept his help. Together they banish Lehzen who had become jealous of the newly married couple, and her mother's treacherous advisor, Conroy, who was still wielding some influence. In a symbolic move, Victoria moves Albert's desk next to hers and for the rest of their lives they rule together.

PRODUCTION STORY

Academy Award® winning British producer Graham King was in production on The Departed, when the idea for The Young Victoria was presented to him.

"A mutual friend arranged a meeting with Sarah Ferguson and she pitched several projects to me. She was full of ideas and she had one about Queen Victoria. She said she always wanted to show the queen in a different way to how she was commonly perceived, as always in mourning. The idea stayed with me and I talked to Marty (Scorsese) about it and he pointed out it had never been done before. I've been trying to make a film in the UK for 15 years and I'd never found the right script or even the right material. I'd never had the emotion or the passion to make a film in the UK before now. But this felt right."

Oscar® winning screen-writer Julian Fellowes heard about the project early on and contacted King about writing the script. Having been interested for a long time in the life of Queen Victoria, it was a dream project for him. "I was very keen. It's always a great advantage when a subject comes to you that is already in your life. I thought if someone else writes this film I'll have to kill myself!" Fellowes says. "I met Graham and Scorsese in Martin's trailer when they were shooting The Departed, which in itself was an iconic day."

King and Scorsese were so taken with Fellowes' ideas they immediately commissioned him to write the script. Six months later it was completed. King was impressed. "His first draft was close to a shooting script, I knew as soon as I read it we had a movie. It's very rare to get a first draft that is as good as this was, but as he said, he was born to write this."

For Fellowes it was the early life of the young queen that fascinated him. "Ninety nine per cent of the public don't know anything about the story of her early life and will be surprised." The film is set in the period from 1836, the year before Victoria ascended the throne, to 1840 the year she married Prince Albert and sets out to revise the widely held picture of Queen Victoria as an elderly widow dressed in black. "The Queen Victoria everyone knows is the older Widow of Windsor with the handkerchief on her head, a rather fat woman in black looking depressed. Very few people know about the other side of her, her early life: that she was young, that she loved dancing, that she loved music and that she was very romantic. Some girls like to have fun and she was certainly one of them," explains Fellowes. "But the extraordinary story at the beginning of her reign is how everyone tries to control her. I was convinced we should begin the film before her succession and her marriage to Albert. That way you can see her struggle with her mother, the Duchess of Kent, who tried to devise a role for herself so she could get more control. The business of instant celebrity is also interesting," Fellowes continues. "One minute Victoria was living under virtual house arrest, the next she was the most famous woman in the world."

The early part of the film presents Victoria living in a virtual prison. Fellowes explains Victoria's early life. "Before her 63 year reign began, Victoria had a horrible childhood. Her father died before her first birthday, leaving her mother, the Duchess of Kent, to raise the sole heir to the throne. The Duchess can never have another child who is in line for the throne because her husband is dead. She's just got this one frail little squib who will be Queen if only she doesn't die. This created in her a kind of neurotic protectionism, a smothering childhood where Victoria could not have her own room and had to sleep on a little cot next to her mother's bed until she was 18. She wasn't able to go up or down stairs without holding an adult hand. She had almost no friends. It was a terribly lonely childhood."

The film charts Victoria's journey to the throne. It was a difficult one as her own mother the Duchess of Kent, in league with Sir John Conroy, controller of her household tried to get power over Victoria by being named Regent. This would allow the Duchess to effectively be Queen until Victoria was old enough to rule if she was to take the crown before her 18th birthday. But King William IV survived until his niece was 18. "The death of William IV changed everything," says Fellowes. "Victoria ascended to the throne and emerged from her mother's shadow.”

At the heart of the film is the love story of Victoria and Albert, who she married in 1840. This happy and fulfilled chapter is the focus of the film. "Prince Albert was purposefully chosen for Victoria over his less attractive older brother, by his uncle King Leopold of Belgium," explains Fellowes. "Leopold was using Albert to jostle for power and influence over the British throne and considered him ideal for a woman who was determined to marry for love. What is interesting is that Albert fell for her completely. He came from a very dour German court and suddenly he was with this girl who was out for a good time. She loved dancing, music, riding. Everyone had overlooked the possibility that they would fall in love with each other."

What appealed to King about the story was the romance. "It is a pure love story to me. It is a human story, a story that people can relate to rather than just being a standard period film or film about royalty. I didn't want it to be a conventional period film, but something a bit hipper and a bit edgier."

With the screenplay underway, the producers' attention turned to who would direct the film.

Graham King explains how director Jean-Marc Vallée came on board. "Jean-Marc's film C.R.A.Z.Y. landed on my desk and I took it home one night and watched it. I was really impressed by it. I immediately called Marty and told him he had to see the film as I thought Jean-Marc had real talent; not only visually, but how he dealt with the characters was fascinating to me. I actually thought it was Scorsese-ish. Marty watched it and also loved it." King met with Vallée and found they had the same approach to the material. "We both wanted to make something with an edge to it, with amazing visuals, but with characters that the audience could relate to. Jean-Marc was a hot property in Hollywood after C.R.A.Z.Y., and he had a lot of scripts thrown at him, but this was the only script he felt passionately about. I was really excited about his vision for the film."

Co-producer Denis O'Sullivan adds, "Graham and I watched C.R.A.Z.Y. in late 2006 and immediately felt that Jean-Marc had such a sympathetic feel for a young protagonist caught in conflict with himself and his family. That dynamic is much the same for the young princess Victoria. The important thing for all of us was that The Young Victoria be first and foremost about the characters. Our aim has always been to have people forget that they're watching a "period film" after the first fifteen minutes, and just have them completely invested in Victoria and the very human family around her."

Director Vallée was won over by the strength of the story, Fellowes' writing and the complexity and integrity of the characters, but it was the girl at the heart of the story who really inspired him. "It's rare to read a good script and I loved this one. It was character driven and was a beautifully observed piece about family and human relationships and I wanted to understand more about these characters. I'm moved by beautiful stories and this is one - of the young girl who became the Queen of England at 18 years old. It touched me. It's also a family drama and I like to explore those relationships, to show what goes on under the surface. Thematically it's similar to C.R.A.Z.Y., but in a completely different culture, class, period and setting, but family relationships are a universal subject."

The romance of Victoria's marriage to Albert also caught Vallée's imagination. "Victoria was lucky enough to find her soul-mate in Albert. There was a mystical quality to their relationship. They were born three months apart and the same mid-wife delivered them both. They wrote the same things in their diaries and although their marriage was arranged, they really fell in love."

Vallée identified a rebellious streak in the young Victoria which also appealed to him. "She was really quite a rebel. She was a woman in a man's world and despite being tiny, she had balls! She was very confident for someone of her age and she wanted to show her mother and all those men she was surrounded by that she wasn't too young, she could be Queen. She had grown up effectively like a prisoner in Kensington Palace, where she couldn't do anything on her own. She shared a bedroom with her mother, and she couldn't even walk down stairs without holding someone's hand. As soon as she had the opportunity to taste freedom, when she became Queen, she wanted to show everyone she could do it alone. She didn't want to be told what to do."

Julian Fellowes was delighted by the producers' choice of director. "I think Jean-Marc is a great director, I have absolutely no hesitation in saying that. I was mad about his film C.R.A.Z.Y. and I was thrilled when he was chosen for this. Jean-Marc conceives the narrative in a visual way that makes a scene much clearer. What's extraordinary about him is he's so relaxed. This was his first big English-speaking film and yet he looks as if it's his thirtieth, which is very impressive as there are a lot of big scenes: operas, balls and the coronation. It was a lucky day for me that he got the job. He also knows the film he wants to make, so you have a wonderful feeling of security that there is someone at the helm who's got both hands on the wheel and believe me that is not always the case!"

Emily Blunt was cast to play the title role. "Before I had really had time to think about who would play Victoria I got a call from Emily Blunt's agent saying she would like to meet me," says Graham King. "She came over and said she had read the script and she was desperate to play this part. She had a huge passion for the role. After that I watched everything she'd been in and realized she was perfect. She's the real deal as an actress. Shortly after my meeting with her, Marty and I were at the Golden Globes and as we watched Emily accept her Globe (for Gideon's Daughter), Marty said "that's Queen Victoria".

For Vallée it was a matter of serendipity. "It was perfect timing that this script and Emily came together. There was some hype around her in Hollywood and after seeing her in My Summer of Love you could see she was a wonderful actress on the rise. At my first meeting with her I knew that she understood the character. Casting is very instinctive and you have to trust in the performance you're going to get. After I saw the first dailies, she more than matched my expectations. She's so talented, she brings such nuances to the performance that she makes us care about the character and the camera adores her."

Emily explains her passion for the role. "I couldn't help but be attracted to this remarkable, high-spirited, feisty girl. The script was very exciting, as the public and private Victoria are very different and you realize what a performance it was to be a queen." Blunt found herself identifying with Victoria. "I identify with her hugely. We all know what it is like to be a teenager, to stubbornly think we know it all and to actually be in a job which is way over your head, not to mention being deeply in love for the first time. She had such zest for life at a young age and would talk with such passion about the people she loved, opera even food."

Blunt also welcomed the chance to challenge the common view held about Victoria. "I was blown away by how remarkable she was and she seemed like a very modern character, a very 21st century sort of woman. It appealed that it was an opportunity to play someone who is a contradiction to people's preconception of what she was like. Everyone knows her as the mourning Queen who was wheeled around in black with a hanky on her head and was kind of repressed, but she was just the polar opposite when she was younger. That was exciting to me, that I could change people's opinion of what Victoria was like."

Blunt was also enthused by the vision for the film of her French-Canadian director. "I've never met a director as passionate about a project as Jean-Marc before. I think he was the perfect choice, because he has the most beautiful eye. I can't even begin to compliment him on his vision for this film. It's good not to have an English or European director, because he doesn't hold this period in too much reverence. I think we all have a tendency to do that here and then it becomes stuffy and unapproachable. I think that Jean-Marc brings this very modern approach to it and he's sees her as a rebel. When he said that to me at our first meeting I was completely taken aback at first, and then I realised he's so right it's scary! We couldn't have asked for a better guy for this."

The filmmakers next turned to the casting of Albert. Graham King explains how Rupert Friend was an easy choice. "We looked at a lot of young European actors for Albert; the most important thing was for there to be chemistry between the actor and Emily, without that there wouldn't be a movie. We knew of Rupert from Pride and Prejudice and as soon as he came and sat in a room with Emily it was a done deal. I think he's an up and coming star. We were really lucky with the casting of both Emily and Rupert."

Vallée adds. "I had an image of Albert in my mind, before we cast Rupert, and how the actor might play him and when Rupert came on board he was just right. He had a very good understanding of the character and he did a lot of research to get him right, with the accent and his deportment. He really looks the part, he looks so romantic!"

Rupert Friend's knowledge of Albert before playing him was limited. "I was aware of him, partly as I would see his statue in Hyde Park every day. But when I started to read about him I realized what a huge force he was in the marriage and what a huge influence he had over Britain and I started to realize that he was one of the great under-sung heroes of British history. Victoria's love for him after his death is almost the biggest testament to the man that he was. One of the most moving things about the script and then reading about his life, was that it really broke her in half when he died and for that to happen they have to have had an extraordinary bond. This film explores the beginning of that bond and what Julian has done brilliantly is to make it human. It's not a gooey love story, they had huge rows at the beginning and it wasn't an easy road by any means."

Friend was also taken with Victoria's character. "The common perception is the dowager in black, but we mustn't forget that even people we know as old women were once sixteen-year old girls who liked dancing, and Victoria was definitely one of those. I think audiences will be surprised by the force of her passion, her vivacity and hunger for life and her refusal to be told what to do which gave her an immense dynamism as a young woman."

Vallée's original approach to his subject matter, also appealed to Friend. "I think Jean-Marc is very interested in smashing clichés. I think we see a lot of things in film that get repeated over and over again without question and I think his approach is different. He wants to make a modern film, which happens to be set in the nineteenth century. Wherever possible he is trying to skirt around traditional period filmmaking, whether it is in the lighting or in the use of music. We've also tried hard to mark the difference in behavior when people are on their own and when they are in public. I think that takes imagination and guts, because some of it may not be 100% historically accurate, but I think it's interesting to explore what we imagined it might have been like."

The differing emphasis in the public and private carried through into the costume and make-up as Friend explains. "I spent a lot of time with Jenny Shircore who designed the make-up and we looked at hundreds of pictures, but these are always posed yet we have scenes of Albert in his night-shirt. So we replicated some of his famous looks and then tried to imagine what Albert might have looked like 'with his hair down'. I found it very helpful to be involved in every detail, down to the moustache and color of neck-tie as it all helps to create the man."

Friend took dancing, calligraphy and archery lessons to help build as accurate a portrait as possible, as well as working with a voice coach. "I worked with a voice-coach and a German teacher. We were looking at the placement of the accent and how strongly to do it and we wanted to put in as much German as possible, because Victoria and Albert did speak German to each other."

Vallée didn't feel that bringing a foreign eye to a different culture was particularly relevant. "I didn't consciously bring something different to the project by not being from that culture. It probably helped me to tell the story as I have a distance from it. I didn't want to make a classic British period film. I was aiming more for realism and so I gave a lot of importance to details. I tried to understand the history, the culture and the characters by doing my homework. The difference may be in trying to tell the story with a rhythm, which comes through the use and choice of music."

Blunt and Friend were delighted to have the opportunity to work opposite each other.

Friend says "I was really, really excited to work with Emily as I've been a fan from a distance for a long time. I think she's one of the most exciting actors we have. Her work is consistently exciting, challenging and always so real so I was over the moon to be able to work with her."

The rest of the impressive cast was then assembled. O'Sullivan explains the filmmakers' choices. "We wanted Paul (Bettany) from the beginning as he's such a remarkable actor, a real chameleon and he has genuine charm, which is so important for the character of Melbourne. The audience needs to fall under Melbourne's sway just as Victoria does. Paul really delivers that seductive quality amazingly well."

The filmmakers were keen to cast Miranda Richardson early on in the casting process. "We were hoping to attract her to the film. She's so accomplished that we just thought she would be so perfect," says O'Sullivan. "She read the script and seemed to really connect to the Duchess of Kent who, in many ways is the opposite of Miranda. Miranda is very sweet and outspoken, whereas the Duchess was a bit cold and reserved, especially with Victoria. We are all amazed by the chemistry between Emily and Miranda, there are times when it is genuinely uncomfortable watching them in a scene, as the scenes are so intense and real. It is a joy to watch."

Graham King was determined to cast Mark Strong as Conroy having been impressed by him in the BBC's The Long Firm and Syriana. He saw Conroy as an alcoholic, not a villain, but an abuser who was clinging to the powerful women he worked for, The Duchess of Kent and Princess Victoria. "There are scenes in the film that are unlike any I've seen in other period films," says O'Sullivan. "When Mark gets physically violent with Emily, it feels very real, very universal. You forget about the setting and that these are royals and you just fear for her safety. Mark brought that amazing menace but also real pathos to Conroy. I think more than any other character Conroy was the one that consistently surprised us as Mark brought him to life. You expect him to be the guy who kicks the dog, which he does of course, but he's also the guy who pets the dog and who has moments of introspection where he questions what he's done with his life. He made him much more interesting than the standard mustache-twirling villain."

Jim Broadbent was cast in the role of King William. O'Sullivan explains Broadbent's involvement. "Back in 2005 when Graham King was finishing shooting The Departed and the whole idea of doing a film about Queen Victoria came up, one of the first things Graham said was "It'll be great we'll get all the best British actors in it and we'll get someone like Jim Broadbent to play the King." Two summers later there we were on set with Jim blowing off the roof of the location as King William. He has limited screen time, but he makes so much out of every single moment. You laugh at him because he's larger than life, but you also see his tenderness towards Victoria and his awareness of his own mortality."

Harriet Walter takes the role of King William's wife, Queen Adelaide. O'Sullivan says, "Jean-Marc met with Harriet and called immediately afterwards saying 'We've found Queen Adelaide.'" He was so taken with her because she was funny, charming and warm.

All the things we wanted in Adelaide. "Harriet's performance is a real revelation because she took a part that might have seemed small on the page and she invested it with such raw emotion and integrity. Adelaide is Victoria's mentor and you always know she's got Victoria's best interest at heart which is so important as everyone else is pushing and pulling at Victoria with their own agendas."

Hagen Bogdanski was recruited to be director of photography. Vallée explains his choice. "Hagen did such a great job on The Lives of Others which was unique and original. We had a number of German elements to the film, there was German blood in the monarchy and we had a number of German actors working on the film and I liked that he was German, it seemed right. He's also very calm and he was an essential creative accomplice. He was also able to be edgy, he would often joke, 'I'm getting out of my comfort zone for you Jean-Marc.' He trusted my eye and it was nice of him to be humble enough to allow me to design shots."

O' Sullivan adds, "We'd all seen The Lives of Others and loved the look of the film. We met with Hagen and he had a real connection to this story of a young person trying to find her voice. He was also very interested in the German aspect of the film. The idea that the British Royal Family had its roots in Germany. Hagen is an artist and watching him and Jean-Marc collaborate every day was a treat."

Graham King had originally looked at filming in Eastern Europe and Germany, because of the expense of filming in the UK, but soon decided that it was essential to film in the UK in order for the film to be as authentic as possible.

Filming took place at 17 locations throughout England including Blenheim Palace, Hampton Court Palace, Arundel Castle, Lincoln Cathedral, Ham House, Lancaster House, Belvoir Castle, Wilton House, Ditchley Park and Balls Park.

Graham King explains, "It adds so much to the film to shoot at these beautiful locations. You look at these places and think how can you not shoot here. Not only does the film look ravishing, but it's important for everyone especially the cast and director to feel that authenticity and see that translate onto the screen."

"We had so many locations on this film it was incredible. I believe we were on location for something like 37 days out of a 50 day shoot," says O'Sullivan. "To have access to all those wondrous places was so important, because it immediately transports you. I've seen so many period films where you can tell that the producers have spent money on one or two beautiful locations and that's it. For an audience to really feel like they're getting a glimpse into what it was like to be royal it was important to have a big visual scope to the film."

In order to carry through the accurate recreation of the period, Alastair Bruce acted as historical advisor to ensure that etiquette and historic details were accurate. His experience as a broadcaster and his work at the College of Arms assured the filmmakers they were in good hands. "I'm fascinated about detail," says Bruce. "There is so much to be gained by getting it right because it affects the subconscious. It's my responsibility to make sure that in the way the performers interact with one another and in the way they look at one another that the correct form is observed. That their pronunciation is correct, that the costume and production details are correct, that the Royal regalia are in the right place. I am there eagle-eyed to make sure every detail is correct. If we get it right then the director's story will sing."

Vallée states, "Alastair was very useful to me as he was able to give me an insight into a world which I didn't know at all. The way these people lived, how they held themselves, the Royal protocol, how they dressed - these details were all important to bring this world to life and getting it right helps the actors behave in a certain way. It was important to re-create the luxury and beauty as accurately as possible to do justice to the story."

O'Sullivan adds, "Julian Fellowes introduced us to Alastair and the film benefited from it greatly. Alastair was on set a lot and he was not only a great source of information, but a true cheerleader for the film. He would look at some of Sandy Powell's costumes and just get so pleased at the level of detail. I believe he has a time machine because he knows so much about the period when the film is set. For him to be impressed by our costumes, our hair and make up and production design is a thrill. He was a god-send."

The costumes and production design was able to benefit from the help and support of Swarovski Crystals. Crystallized Swarovski elements were include in the Coronation Sceptre and the Coronation Ring and various jewelry loaned by Swarovski from their archive collection was used in the production including Victoria's spectacular tiara.

The accuracy of period was carried through from the locations to the coronation crown.

"The locations are exquisite because they capture not only the period, but also a sense of the spirit Jean-Marc wants in the film," says Bruce. "For example, Ham House stood in for Kensington Palace and Ham House is pretty devoid of development since it was lived in. Victoria's home before she became queen was quite frugal as they didn't have much money. Everything was a bit run down and lacked color and that's captured here. Lincoln Cathedral stood in for Westminster Abbey as it's closer to what Westminster Abbey would have looked like at the time as the Abbey has now been cluttered with all sorts of stuff since Victoria's reign."

For Buckingham Palace the production chose Blenheim Palace with interiors shot at Belvoir Castle, Ditchley and Lancaster House. Queen Victoria was the first monarch to live at Buckingham Palace. For Windsor Castle, Arundel Castle was a perfect fit with Belvoir Castle providing wonderful grounds for the Windsor Great Park scenes.

Having made a replica of the crown jewels as a child, Bruce was well-placed to determine the accuracy of the jewels replicated for the film. "I was terribly excited when the crown arrived for the Coronation scene. They'd got it right to the nth degree, all the details were in place and it looked fantastic. The black Princess ruby at the front from the battles of the 100 years war and worn by Henry V at Agincourt, the pearl earrings of Elizabeth I hanging from the centre and the tiny sapphire at the top that was in the ring worn by Edward the Confessor all brought together by the Stuart Sapphire at the front of the crown. The stones emphasize the immense history and burden of responsibility that the young Queen had undertaken."

The Crown

Victoria was crowned with the Imperial State Crown which is generally re-modeled for each monarch. Elizabeth II was crowned with the St. Edward's Crown, which was originally made for Charles II in 1661.

For Elizabeth II they made a frame to fit inside the St. Edward's Crown but, as it was designed to sit on the head of a bewigged man it inevitably looked too big. After being crowned, Elizabeth decided to only use the Imperial State Crown going forward. It includes most of the stones from Victoria's crown although a few are in different places.

For Bruce the recreation of the moment Victoria is told she will be Queen was particularly moving. "The sense of realization that Emily demonstrates of her discovery that she will be Queen is very moving. It is beautifully portrayed. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Lord Chamberlain arrive at Kensington Palace to tell her that her uncle is dead and she will now be Queen, he falls on his knee and takes her hand and says 'Your Majesty.' It's terribly touching and moving and full of the romance of the moment and so powerfully portrayed it sent a shudder through me when we filmed it."

Having Julian Fellowes on set throughout the shoot was also extremely valuable. O'Sullivan says, "Julian and Alastair kept us pretty honest throughout. We couldn't fudge too many things and just say 'well it's a movie,' because you'd look over in the corner and Julian or Alastair would give a shake of the head and that was it. Julian's presence was also a great comfort to the actors because they were playing real people, no matter that no one in the audience would have ever actually seen the characters they portrayed, the actors still wanted to be as true to the reality as possible. Julian is such a font of information and detail that everyone, especially Jean-Marc always felt very confident that we were being as truthful as possible."

HRH Princess Beatrice of York, daughter of Sarah Ferguson and Prince Andrew and descendent of Queen Victoria spent a day on set filming, appearing as a Lady-in-Waiting in the scene of the Coronation of her great-great-great-great grandmother. Princess Beatrice, who is fifth in line for the throne, is the first member of the Royal Family to take a part in a film. "Sarah Ferguson and I discussed her being in the film from the get go," says King. "I thought it would be very sweet to have her in the film. My daughter appears alongside her and I thought it would be fun."

One of the great strengths of C.R.A.Z.Y was the use of music and Vallée didn't allow the fact that he was directing a period film to interfere with his choice of music for the film. "I used to be a D.J. and I like to create a structure for a film using music with the right rhythm and balance. I wanted to combine classical pieces with a rock spirit." To that end, when on-set he would often play Icelandic band Sigur Ros or even The Rolling Stones to create a mood before a scene. He also gave each actor a particular song to listen to as preparation for their role, including “The Best Is Yet To Come” by Frank Sinatra for Paul Bettany’s Lord Melbourne, and the Cat Stevens classic “Trouble” for Emily Blunt’s Victoria.

Says O’Sullivan, “Jean-Marc’s ear for music is terrific. One of the things that drew us to him was his use of music in C.R.A.Z.Y. There are sequences in The Young Victoria that are connected and carried through by music so deftly that you forget you’re watching a period film. There is a stretch early on that’s about nine minutes long, all one piece of music, that covers numerous scenes and plot points—it’s incredible because as we were prepping the film, Jean-Marc already had found this piece of classical music and was basically shooting with that in mind. The result is seamless. The combination of Jean-Marc’s musical bent and Jill Bilcock’s experience on films like Moulin Rouge! made for an amazing chemistry that really works well with Ilan’s score. The whole movie has a pace and rhythm that comes from a very musical place. It’s a great help in telling this story where so many of the emotions are sometimes repressed.”

Executive producer Colin Vaines had previously known Ilan Eshkeri and felt strongly that he would be a perfect fit for the film. In working with Eshkeri, Vallée was able to find a sharp, young talent who immediately responded to the same rock-and-roll vibe inherent in the way the film was shot. “One of the first pieces we heard from Ilan was his interpretation of Schubert’s “Swan Song,” which plays a key role in the film. Ilan saw how Jean-Marc and Jill had structured these two intercutting scenes—one between Victoria and a manipulative Melbourne, the other between lovelorn Albert and his brother—and he just tied these scenes together so beautifully with this one piece of music, it was a revelation,” O’Sullivan says.

Vallée and Eshkeri were very keen to have the music be fluid, so that a source piece can subtly shift and become score, or vice versa, even before the audience realizes it. They felt that this unusual approach to music in a period film would keep the viewer engaged and unsure of where the music was coming from. Often times, a piece of source music is referenced later in the score as an emotional touchstone for the audience, such as the refrain from Schubert’s “Swan Song” which can be found hidden in a few moments of the film when Albert is feeling alone or when Victoria is thinking of him but cannot be with him.

As reference points, Vallée talked to Eshkeri and his music producer Steve McLaughlin at length about music ranging from the traditional, such as Handel’s “Zadok the Priest,” to the extremely unique, such as Sigur Ros and the German pop singer Klaus Nomi. The director was clear in his vision for a score that had energy and heart, without falling into the traps of some other period films, where lutes and cellos underline every emotion.

The final piece of the music puzzle came in the form of a song performed by Grammy-winner Sinéad O’Connor. Entitled “Only You,” the love theme of the film is a heartfelt, ethereal examination of what it means to find your soul-mate after being alone most of your life. “It was very much in line with one of the overriding aims of the film,” says

O'Sullivan, "Which was to be hopeful and tell people that these amazing love stories really can happen, it's not just a fairy tale."

ABOUT THE FILMMAKERS

JEAN-MARC VALLÉE - Director

Montreal filmmaker Jean-Marc Vallée made his ground-breaking feature debut with Liste Noire (Black List), in 1995. The strikingly stylish erotic thriller was a first in its genre in Quebec cinema, and was honored with nine Genie Award nominations. Ten years later, he returned to French-language features with the internationally acclaimed hit, C.R.A.Z.Y. Blending a beguiling coming-of-age tale with a magical ode to outsiders of all ages, the powerful yet poignant C.R.A.Z.Y.'s intensely personal story embraces universal themes. The picture became a phenomenon: distributed in over fifty countries and winning some twenty international festival awards – including the prestigious “Best Canadian Film” prize at the 2005 Toronto International Film Festival, 11 Genie Awards, 15 Jutra Awards, and the Golden Reel Award as Canada’s top-performer at the domestic box office.

Jean-Marc has also flirted with Hollywood (Strangers - 1996, Los Locos - 1997), as well as completing the first two installments of his short film trilogy devoted to father-son relationships; a theme very close to the filmmaker’s heart. Les Fleurs Magiques (Magical Flowers), 1995) and Les Mots Magiques (Magical Words), 1998) are individual pieces unified by a dream-like quality, and an eye for their subject that is both tender, and tortured. Both shorts were awarded numerous festival prizes at home and abroad.

He has also made a name for himself as the director of numerous music videos and commercials.

GRAHAM KING - Producer

Graham King has emerged as a formidable producer of both major motion pictures and independent features. At the 2007 Academy Awards King won a Best Picture Oscar® for the ensemble crime thriller The Departed.

A winner of four Academy Awards® including Best Director and Best Adapted Screenplay, The Departed marked King’s third collaboration with director Martin Scorsese. In 2004, he produced Scorsese’s widely praised Howard Hughes biopic, The Aviator, starring Leonardo DiCaprio, for which King earned an Academy Award® nomination and won a BAFTA Award for Best Picture. He was also honored by the Producers Guild of America with a Golden Laurel Award for Producer of the Year. King was co-executive producer on Scorsese’s epic Academy Award® nominated drama Gangs of New York, starring DiCaprio, Daniel Day-Lewis and Cameron Diaz.

Under King’s first-look producing deal with Warner Bros. Pictures he was a producer of Blood Diamond in 2006. King has a wide range of films in various stages of production and development with the studio as well his independent productions.

King recently launched his independent production company GK Films and The Young Victoria, is the first film produced under this new banner. GK Films also recently completed shooting the thriller Edge of Darkness starring Mel Gibson. Directed by Martin Campbell and based on the BAFTA Award-winning BBC mini-series of the same name, Edge of Darkness is produced by King and Michael Wearing (producer of the BBC mini-series). The screenplay is written by Academy Award® winning screenwriter William Monahan (The Departed) and Andrew Bovell from an original story by Troy Kennedy Martin.

GK Films is set to produce Gore Verbinski's new animated project Rango featuring the voice of Johnny Depp with Blind Wink Productions for Paramount Pictures.

Under GK Films King will continue to foster projects with some of the industry's leading creative talents, including Johnny Depp and his production company, Infinitum Nihil.

During King's reign as President and CEO of Initial Entertainment Group King served as an executive producer on such films as The Dangerous Lives of Altar Boys, produced by and starring Jodie Foster; Michael Mann's biographical drama Ali, starring Will Smith in the title role; and Steven Soderbergh's Oscar-winning® ensemble drama Traffic. King went on to executive produce the television miniseries "Traffic," for which he received an Emmy Award nomination for Outstanding Miniseries.

A native of the United Kingdom, King moved to the United States in 1982.

MARTIN SCORSESE - Producer

Martin Scorsese was born in 1942, on the lower east side of Manhattan in the neighborhood called Little Italy, which later provided the inspiration for several of his films. He earned a BS degree in film communications in 1964, followed by an MA in 1966 at New York University's School of Film. During this time, he made numerous prize-winning short films.

In 1968, Scorsese completed his first feature film, Who's That Knocking at My Door? and later won critical and popular acclaim for his 1973 film Mean Streets. He went on to become one of the world's leading filmmakers.

In 1976, Scorsese's Taxi Driver was awarded the Palme d'Or at the Cannes Film Festival, and it was followed with a series of outstanding successes, including New York, New York, Raging Bull, The Last Temptation of Christ, Goodfellas, Casino, Kundun, The Age of Innocence, Gangs of New York and The Aviator. Scorsese's most recent feature, The Departed, was released to critical acclaim in October 2006 (the film would later win several Academy Awards®, including Best Picture and Best Director). Shine A Light, Scorsese's documentary of the Rolling Stones in concert, was released worldwide in April 2008. He is currently in production on Shutter Island, due for release in 2009.

Scorsese's artistic excellence has been recognized with many honors, including the Golden Lion from the Venice Film Festival, the AFI Lifetime Achievement Award, a Directors Guild of America Lifetime Achievement Award and a Kennedy Center Honor. In addition to his work as a filmmaker, he has also been a staunch advocate for film preservation. He is the founder and chair of The Film Foundation, a non-profit organization dedicated to the preservation and protection of motion picture history; and in 2007, he launched the World Cinema Foundation (of which he serves as both founder and chair), dedicated to the preservation and restoration of neglected films from around the world.

TIM HEADINGTON - Producer

Entrepreneur Tim Headington has made a successful leap into the world of entertainment since forming a collaboration with producer Graham King.

In 2007, Mr. Headington and longtime friend and colleague Graham King together formed Los Angeles based production company GK Films and have since produced the Royal romantic drama The Young Victoria alongside Martin Scorsese and Sarah Ferguson, The Duchess of York, and the thriller Edge of Darkness starring Mel Gibson, directed by Martin Campbell and penned by William Monahan. Mr. Headington is also executive producer on Gore Verbinski's new animated project Rango featuring the voice of Johnny Depp. The film is being produced by GK Films and Blind Wink Productions for Paramount Pictures.

Mr. Headington was first introduced to Mr King in 2004 when he invested in King's former production company Initial Entertainment Group when the company was financing and producing the award winning The Aviator directed by Martin Scorsese. Mr. Headington then went on to Executive Produce, for the company, the thriller First Born starring Elisabeth Shue, and Leonardo DiCaprio's producing debut Gardener of Eden directed by "Entourage's" Kevin Connolly and starring Lukas Haas, Giovanni Ribisi and Erika Christensen.

ALASTAIR BRUCE OF CRIONAICH - Historical Advisor

Alastair Bruce is the Royal, Constitutional and Religious Commentator for Sky News, the UK's premier 24hr satellite news channel, and regularly commentates and contributes to FOX News, ABC and the BBC giving an insight to modern events with a historical perspective.

Alastair has written many books, including "Days of Majesty," "Keepers of the Kingdom" and "The Oldest." He likes to tell history in an entertaining way in order to open the rich culture of the United Kingdom, its style and romance, to as wide an audience as he can reach. He has worked with many independent production companies in the preparation of TV documentaries. Many are regularly aired on Public Broadcasting, Discovery and A&E channels. Among these are "Nicholas and Alexandra," "Victoria and Albert" and "Days of Majesty."

In 1998, The Queen appointed Alastair one of her Officers of Arms, with the title of Fitzalan Pursuivant of Arms Extraordinary. This means that he is engaged with the heraldic and ceremonial heritage of Britain, its Royal Family and the history it tells. He also offers advice to the Palace and Government on how the nation should 'celebrate' itself, and in due course he will help to plan the coronation of the next monarch, using his knowledge of the ancient rites handed down from Ancient times and the Middle Ages.

Alastair has also been one of The Queen's Body Guards in Scotland since 1990, which is called the Royal Company of Archers. He is an Extra Equerry in the Royal Household of TRH The Earl and Countess of Wessex.

Alastair was an officer in the Regular Army for four years, seeing active service in the Falklands War of 1982. He is still a Reservist, serving as a Colonel responsible for Media and Communications. He has commanded his unit, called the Media Operations Group. In March 2004 he completed his period of mobilized service on active operations in Iraq, serving in what in the UK is called Operation TELIC but which the US calls Operation IRAQI FREEDOM.

Alastair has lectured widely in Britain, Europe and the United States. His subjects range from British Imperial History, the Vatican to the Royal story.

ILAN ESHKERI - Composer

Ilan is a British film composer who has established himself as an exciting young talent in the world of film music. Born in London into a musical family, Ilan grew up playing violin and later took up playing guitar in bands. He studied music and English literature at Leeds University, during which time he also worked with film composer Ed Shearmur learning first-hand the technique of film composition. After graduating, he went on to work with other film composers such as Michael Kamen and Hans Zimmer. At this time Ilan began scoring his own projects, and his talent for creating cinematic music on a limited budget soon gained him recognition within the film industry.

When Kamen passed away in 2001, Ilan played a major role in completing the final score for the feature animation Back to Gaya. As a result, Ilan was asked to score Layer Cake directed by Matthew Vaughn and starring Daniel Craig, which became a box office hit and got Ilan a nomination for 'Discovery of the Year' at the world soundtrack awards. This marked the beginning of Ilan's working relationship with Vaughn, and in 2007, Ilan composed his award-winning score for Stardust, starring Robert De Niro, and Michelle Pfeiffer. Their collaboration continues in 2009 Kick Ass adapted from the comic series.

Other scores include Hannibal Rising directed by Peter Webber and produced by Dino De Laurentiis. Earlier in the year Ilan scored Nick Moran's directorial debut, the darkly comic Joe Meek biopic Telstar, starring Con O'Neil and Kevin Spacey. Ilan is currently working with Joel Silver and the Wachowski brothers scoring Ninja Assassin directed by James McTieue.

Ilan has also collaborated with various songwriters; he worked with Annie Lennox re-arranging some of her best known songs to critical acclaim, such as 'Sweet Dreams' and 'Here Comes the Rain Again' for orchestra and band. He has been on tour supporting David Gilmour and programmed strings on Gilmour's hit solo album 'On an Island.' Ilan also co-wrote the international hit single 'Rule The World' with Take That.

Ilan's style demonstrates his love of orchestral music and classic film scores as well as contemporary music; his music prioritises authenticity, utilizing real instruments and the integrity of live performance. Working with real musicians, whether acoustic or electronic is at the core of Ilan's philosophy and he holds close affiliations with many outstanding musicians, working in partnership with them during the creative process. In his view, if music is the soul of a movie then capturing an emotional performance is key to its success.

MAUREEN CROWE - Music Supervisor

From Academy Award winning motion picture Chicago to record breaking The Bodyguard, the rock staple Wayne's World and the cult classic True Romance, Maureen Crowe is a leading music and motion picture executive having produced some the most noteworthy and biggest selling soundtracks of our time. She has been hired as consultant by Warner Brothers Motion Pictures and MGM and has worked with other leading entertainment companies such as Walt Disney Channel, Paramount, Miramax, Interscope, SONY/BMG developing musical material for films and marketing and publicity opportunities.

In 2007, Ms. Crowe co-founded PlanR Soundtracks, which has released front line soundtracks We Are Marshall and special market premiums Cloverfield. She is the current Trustee and former President of the LA Chapter Board of the National Academy of Recording Arts and Sciences (the Grammy people) and has regularly featured as a soundtrack and pop cultural expert on industry panels, in trade and national newspaper articles, on MTV news reports and several VH-1 behind the Music specials.
